Modern Science in the Coming War.

We are on the eve of the most tremendous armed conflict which the world has seen since the downfall of Napoleon the Great. The wars of imperial France were bloody wars, as all the world knows. No slaughtered hecatombs were ever piled so high as the great Emperor piled them. The dead never lay so thickly on any battle-field, of which history makes any mention, as they lay on Eylau and Boradino and Waterloo. What amount of destruction and misery science, in the hands of genius, could, in a given time, deal out on a given number of men was there amply demonstrated.

But it is not saying too much to say that if the European powers let their armed hordes loose upon one another this summer, ruthless destroyer as Na- (Late of poleon was, he will be shown before three years are over to have been a mere tyro in the art of destruction. Since his day all the arts have advanced with rapid strides, but none with strides so rapid as this one. The weapons with which his soldiers were armed, with which the bridge of Lodi was carried, and Austerlitz and Marengo were won, bore much the same relation to the rifle of the present day as the matchlock bore to the old firelock. Death did not in his time flash from the serried ranks until the foemen stood two or three hundred yards apart. It now flies in the air nearly three quarters of a mile, as far as the sharpest eye can make a human figure. His seige artillery would be to-day by no means heavy field pieces. Wellington's heaviest breaching guns at Badajos and Salamanca were twenty-four pounders. The Russians at Inkermann, and the British at Tehernaya, brought thirty-two pounders. into the field with ease and effect. But the advantage which heavy guns have always had over light p. S. WILCOX was considered and ship Chandlery lines in the length of the range than in the size of the ball. A twelve pounder rushing through a column of infantry is full as destructive and almost as demoralizing as one treble the weight; but formerly it could not be projected nearly so far. Science has, in our day, destroyed the difference between them. Recent inventions, some difference between them. Recent inventions, some of them those of our own countrymen, some of Endral of the manner of the manner of the manner of them those of our own countrymen, some of Endral of the manner with more than the deadly power which, forty years ago, belonged only to weapons which sixteen horses could move with difficulty, and which were always pieces de position Moreover, facilities have been created since Waterloo was fought, for bringing together masses of men such as the great Napoleon in his wildest dreams never dreamed of. We all know how the rapidity of is movements dazzled and astounded our fathers. We know he strode over Europe like a magician, taking armies up, as it seemed in those days, in the hollow of his hand, and flinging them in a twinkling of an eye on every point where his giant plans needed them. We know how distance seemed to shrivel up at the blast of his trumpet. We know how the Bankers. Office in the east corner of "Makee's Block," on having advanced like the wind. But great as was the perfection to which he carried the art to rapid concentration, it becomes the crawling of a turtle when compared with the power with which railways have armed the generals of our day. When Napoleon started on his expeditions, armies were of necessity divided into columns, which, in order to secure the bare means of subsistence and of transport, were compelled either to follow each other at tolerably long intervals, or else march on the same point by different circuitous routes. And they did marchliterally marched, trudged every inch of the way on foot, and the eagle flapped his wing over them in approbation if they achieved fifty miles in the twenty four hours. The maddest impatience of the maddest conqueror had in those times to adapt itself to the capabilities of human legs and human stomachs.

It took, even in the hands of Napoleon, a long while to concentrate two hundred thousand men at a point three hundred miles distant; and when they were there it required stupendous energy and stupendous resources to feed them. All the grand old heroes had to take pork and flour into their grandest calculations; and pork and flour, alas! have to be carried about to be of any use.

The other day we were told, in contrast with this, that the present Emperor was able to send twentyfive thousand men in any day from Paris to Lyonsa distance of three hundred miles. It would have taken his uncle a week of forced marches to accommi, and rushed furiously through a crowd of plish the same object. Austria is sending troops into Italy at the same rate. Moreover, the same power which renders this rapid concentration of troops so easy renders their subsistance just as easy. The railroad dumps the soldier now-a-days down on the
